

Marianne Abramsson

is an Associate Professor in Human Geography with a particular research interest in the housing and residential mobility of older people in different geographical contexts, their living conditions, and in the responsibility of the welfare state to ensure good housing conditions to its population. My research is about where and how older people live, their possibilities in the housing market, what type of housing they choose and why.